Walt Disney's entertainment empire, often referred to as the "House of Mouse," owes much of its iconic status to Mickey Mouse. Mickey's distinctive round ears, often in silhouette or on hats, have become one of the world's most recognizable corporate logos. However, a few pivotal decisions in the 1920s could have led to a different emblem — rabbit ears.

In the mid-1920s, Disney, a young animator, was producing the Alice Comedies, a series blending live-action with animation. Eager to focus on entirely animated films, he struck a deal with Universal in 1927 to create a series featuring Oswald the Lucky Rabbit. Universal had selected both the character's name and species – Oswald, chosen from a hat of names, became a rabbit due to market saturation of cartoon cats.

Disney and his chief animator, Ub Iwerks, created Oswald, whose design Universal initially disliked as old and pudgy. Disney and Iwerks revamped Oswald, giving him a more energetic appearance, bearing a striking resemblance to a certain every mouse Disney would later create. Oswald's distinctive personality was also crafted, making him mischievous yet endearing.

Oswald's first film, "Trolley Troubles," debuted in 1927, marking Disney's introduction to character merchandise licensing. The film succeeded, prompting Disney and Iwerks to produce new films rapidly. However, Disney's association with Oswald ended due to conflicts with his distributor, Charles Mintz. Mintz forced Disney out, leading him to create a new character he could fully own – Mickey Mouse, introduced in November 1928.

Oswald continued in films for over a decade but was eventually overshadowed by Mickey. In a surprising twist, Disney reacquired Oswald's rights from Universal in 2006, leading to Oswald's revival in Disney entertainment and merchandise, including a 2010 video game where he starred.

Every culture in the world has marriage and wedding ceremonies. Usually marriages are between one woman (the bride) and one man (the groom). However, in other parts of the world a man may have several wives, or, as in some areas of Tibet and India, a wife may have more than one husband. There are also many different kinds of wedding ceremonies practiced around the world. These ceremonies can be very short and simple, or very long and complicated.

One of the largest and most expensive wedding ceremonies in recent times was held in Dubai in 1981. The couple tying the knot at this wedding were the son of Sheik Rashid Bin Saeed Al Maktoum and Princess Salama. The wedding ceremony took seven days and cost 44 million dollars. It was held in a large building which was specially built for the ceremony and looked like a stadium. The bride and the groom needed a large place for their wedding because more than 20,000 guests were invited.

The reason why a man and a woman get married also vary. Sometimes they marry because they are in love, sometimes they marry someone they meet through a matchmaker, and sometimes they marry because their parents tell them that they must marry.

One unusual example of an arranged marriage took place in Bangladesh in 1986. The groom was an eleven-month-old boy, and the bride was a three-month-old girl. They were the youngest married couple ever.

The parents of the bride and groom arranged the marriage as away of ending a fight between the two families who had been arguing over a farm for twenty years. Both families thought that they owned the farm, but no one knew exactly. The fight ended for good when the young boy married the young girl. By arranging this marriage, neither family was forced to lose face. The two families agreed to give the farm to the young couple.

Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the correct answer to each of the questions from 45 to 50.

Vertical farming is the practice of producing food on vertically inclined surfaces. Instead of farming vegetables and other foods on a single level, such as in a field or a greenhouse, this method produces foods in vertically stacked layers commonly integrated into other structures like a skyscraper, shipping container or repurposed warehouse.

Using Controlled Environment Agriculture (CEA) technology, this modern idea uses indoor farming techniques. The artificial control of temperature, light, humidity, and gases makes producing foods and medicine indoor possible. In many ways, vertical farming is similar to greenhouses were metal reflectors and artificial lighting augment natural sunlight. The primary goal of vertical farming is maximizing crops output in a limited space.

There are four critical areas in understanding how vertical farming works: physical layout, lighting, growing medium, and sustainability features. Firstly, the primary goal of vertical farming is producing more foods per square meter. To accomplish this goal, crops are cultivated in stacked layers in a tower like structure. Secondly, a perfect combination of natural and artificial lights is used to maintain the perfect light level in the room. Technologies such as rotating beds are used to improve lighting efficiency. Thirdly, instead of soil, aeroponic, aquaponic or hydroponic growing mediums are used. Peat moss or coconut husks and similar non-soil mediums are very common in vertical farming. Finally, the vertical farming method uses various sustainability features to offset the energy cost of farming. In fact, vertical farming uses 95 percent less water.

Vertical farming has a lot of promise and sounds like the farm of the future. However, there are a few stumbling blocks to consider before rushing full speed ahead into vertical farming.
